A Fire Zouave.

A Gallant Regiment.

Horrible Sights at the Battle-field.

TAKEN PRISONER.

W. F. SANFORD, CAPTAIN, T. N. V.

WASHINGTON, D. C., THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1863.—TEN PAGES.

Vol. 74, No. 11—Whole No. 482.

THE ECHOES.

Survivor of a Yankee Soldier after a Battle.

A CRUISE UP THE COAST.

An Interference by the Foreign Powers.

DEATH OF RAILDON.

The Revolutionary Party in a Triple Position.

By S. J. CHILL LAND.

The Summer of 1863 had been a long one for the Revolutions in Europe. The Italian War was over, and the French had been defeated. But the revolutionists had not given up. The war was only a beginning. The revolutionists were determined to take the country by force and satisfy the demands of the people. They were bold and brave, and they were ready to fight. The revolutionists were not afraid of anything. They were ready to risk everything to get what they wanted. The revolutionists were not alone. They had friends in high places. They had friends in the army. They had friends in the government. They had friends in the people. The revolutionists were strong. The revolutionists were fighting. The revolutionists were winning.